

Farewell to the American Dream? Anti-Immigrant Sentiment and the Future of Citizenship

The notion that anyone could come here and become an American has remained a core part of American identity.

Recent U.S. debates have turned vitriolic against two varieties of newcomers: Mexicans and people from the Middle East.

Does this signal a change in the American political landscape, or is it something we have seen before?

What must happen if meaningful immigration reform, and a restoration of the promise of the American dream, is to be achieved?

THE ROBERT A. FRIEDMAN LECTURE FOR 2011

Paul R. Spickard

Department of History, University of California, Santa Barbara

Author of Almost All Aliens: Immigration, Race, and Colonialism in American History and Identity (2007); Japanese Americans (2009); Is Lighter Better? (2007), and other books

Tuesday, March 15
12:45-2:15 PM, Baruch College, Room VC 3-150

Co-sponsored by Baruch Department of History, Department of Black and Hispanic Studies, and the Jewish Studies Center

Baruch
COLLEGE

The City University of New York

Contact: Prof. Vincent DiGirolamo (646) 312-4334
vincent.digirolamo@baruch.cuny.edu