ART 1000 Introduction to Design and Visual Communication 3 hours; 3 credits
This introductory studio course acquaints students with the terms and procedures essential to aesthetic decision making and analysis. Students learn how to apply principles of color, line, and form to the everyday world, including the business environment. Individual creative projects in abstract visual problem-solving explore the links between word and image, while study of the elements and principles of design provide a basis for further study in graphic communication. The course includes relevant theoretical, historical, and contemporary perspectives. Museum and gallery visits support its goals. No art background is needed.

MSC 3022 American Popular Song (1875-1970)  3 hours; 3 credits
An investigation into the sources and expressive characteristics of a popular lyric art in the United States. Beginning with the rise of a cult of melodism after the Civil War, the development of American song is traced through the contributions of Stephen Collins Foster and Dan Emmett. Subsequently, full consideration is given to sociological, ethnic, and cultural influences of popular music during the eras surrounding both world wars. Melody writing and song creation are integral parts of the study.
Prerequisite: MSC 1003 or 1005.

PSY 3059 Developmental Psychology: Personality in Childhood and Adolescence
This course surveys the history of the field of child psychology. Its primary aim is to develop students’ awareness of the dynamic interaction among those biological, sociocultural, and psychological factors that influence the child’s developing personality. Prevailing theories of development, including the cognitive, psychoanalytic, psychosocial, and social learning perspective, are covered. Research methodology and case study material are emphasized. (EDU 1101 and PSY 3059 are equivalent. If PSY 3059 is taken, credit cannot be given for EDU 1101.)

Prerequisite: PSY 1001.

PSY 3060 Developmental Psychology: Adult Personality
The major goal is to give students an introduction to the scientific study of personality by emphasizing dynamics, development, and assessment. Developmental issues, such as identity formation, the evolution of interpersonal relations, and the handling of life crises, will be explored from the perspective of stage theorists such as Freud, Erikson, and Kohlberg. Case studies will serve as a partial basis for the evaluation of personality dynamics and development.

Prerequisite: PSY 1001.

PSY 3061 Psychology of Life Experience
This course focuses on the development of the healthy person throughout the life cycle. It examines the basic life crises and many stressful situations most individuals experience (e.g., sexual behavior, marriage and family, work and career, aging and death) and considers ways in which mastery and growth can emerge from life crises. The course presents the major theoretical and research contributions of psychoanalysis, behaviorism, humanism, and cognitive psychology and explores their application to an understanding of the normal adjustment process at each stage of the life span. (This course is not open to students who previously enrolled in PSY 3046.)

ECO 9708 Microeconomics for Managers
2 hours; 2 credits
Today's managers face increasing complexities in the economic environment within which they have to make decisions. Managerial decisions involving international competitiveness, mergers and acquisitions (M & A), corporate downsizing, automation, and the impact of government regulations require systematic analysis of situations with sophisticated decision-making apparatus. This course is designed to provide the managers with tools essential for efficient managerial decisions. Being a core MBA course, it is designed to provide basic tools of analysis that can be effectively utilized in more specialized courses in the MBA curriculum.
